New signs mark sites of historic trails

Many Utah roads follow routes used by pioneers, Pony Express.

Long before they became paved highways, many of Utah's roads were crude trails blazed by pioneers and Pony Express riders.

Motorists heading to and from Salt Lake City may be unaware they often travel nearly the same routes taken by Utah's Mormon settlers, migrants headed to California or horsemen bent on delivering mail and money to early residents of the West.

Their awareness is about to be heightened.

Utah Department of Transportation crews are busy this week installing 49 historic markers throughout the northern part of the state. The "auto tour route" signs will let travelers know they are driving in or near the path of the Mormon Pioneer Trail, two branches of the California Trail and the Pony Express Trail.

UDOT and the National Park Service are splitting the $10,000 cost of making and posting the signs. The Utah project is part of a larger effort by the Park Service to coordinate historic trail identification in 13 states.

Historic trail markers already exist in several states, but the Utah signs are the first to feature more than one trail per sign, recognizing that some trails shared roughly the same alignments.

Twenty-seven of the signs feature logos of the Mormon Pioneer, California and Pony Express trails. They are being placed between the Wyoming border and Salt Lake City along I-80, I-84, U-65 and Emigration Canyon Road along a corridor the three trails shared.

Twelve signs sport the California and Pony Express trail logos and will be positioned along U-201 and I-80 to Wendover, although the Hastings branch of the California Trail and the Pony Express Trail were actually 40 or more miles to the south.

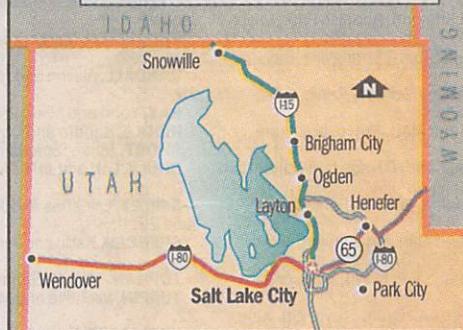

Ten signs featuring the California Trail logo will be seen between Farmington and Snowville on I-15 and I-84. The Salt Lake cutoff of the California Trail was located just to the east of those highways.

Jere Krakow, superintendent of the Park Service's Salt Lake-based Long Distance Trail Office, said the signs are aimed at confirming to motorists that they are traveling along the path of the various historic trails that helped shape the settlement of the Western United States.

"We've tried to come up with a system that will make drivers aware of the topography and the locations that these people took and yet won't compete with the signing that is necessary for driving safety," said Jim Naegle, a traffic engineer in charge of the historic trail marking project for UDOT.

"We really have to be conscious about what we put up on the highway because we can't just put anything up there. We've been working for over a year to come up with these signs."

All the signs should be in place by the end of the week, Naegle said.

The Park Service now will turn its attention to placing multi-trail historic signs in Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho, Nevada, California, Oregon and Washington. Krakow said that could take as long as a decade.

lobbyist after lobbyist for businesses asked lawmakers Wednesday not to delay the law, others told commissioners that homeowners have to pay more. The large businesses are 60 percent, even 75 percent, of the tax year. Seven gravel companies are 100 percent of their members and small businesses shouldn't be expected to pay more than half said House Majority Whip John Valentine, R-Riverton. The new law says 100 percent of disputed taxes owed by businesses who are assessed by commission must be escrow accounts. The law by local governments, county officials. That's why local officials struggled to find ways to large businesses the taxes were collected.

In counties where mines, railroads make up a percentage of the tax base, big refunds can be devastating, a number of county officials said at Wednesday's hearings.

But as testimony and debate in the committee showed, counties can impose special "judgment levies" on all county property owners to come up with the money. Most counties don't do that. As Emery County Assessor Jim Fauver said: "Such (judgment levies) are politically difficult."

In fact, a few committee members received a clear message Wednesday: Local county officials like the escrow law because when taxes go up in November they can blame the Legislature.

The new law "says the Legislature did it," said Sen. Howard Stephenson, R-Draper, who is also president of the Utah Taxpayers Association. Local officials don't have to turn to the judgment levy "and take the heat for raising taxes," charged Stephenson.

Stephenson and others also questioned the need to escrow 100 percent of disputed taxes. The law says after disputed taxes have been resolved, the final taxes owed by the county or school district go to those entities and all property owners' taxes are reduced accordingly.

Historically, between 25 percent and 26 percent of multicounty businesses' disputed taxes are ultimately ordered returned to the businesses. Stephenson worries that if 100 percent of the disputed taxes are placed into an escrow account, and the big-business taxpayer finally gets 25 percent back, counties and school districts won't lower tax rates the next year to let the other 75 percent flow back to all county taxpayers.

While it is true county and school officials will have to go through Truth in Taxation public hearings to keep any of the 75 percent, they could still do so and tell taxpayers that taxes weren't going up.

Greg Fredde, vice president of the taxpayers association, said in the past, local officials have held the mandatory Truth in Taxation hearings and said: "We aren't raising your tax rates." That is correct, but they also don't say that taxes would go down if nothing was done, Fredde said.

A controversial Tax Commission decision on intangible property assessments of multicounty businesses brings the automatic tax increase to a head this year.
